

By Neil Pedley, April 2009

Having done much in recent years to bring light to the plight of the Rwandan people, French-American documentary filmmaker Anne Aghion paints a less harrowing but equally compelling portrait of the most inhospitable terrain on Earth. Focusing on a quartet of researchers, Aghion charts the vast, outer reaches of human endurance as the group commit to six months of "deep field" isolation in temperatures as low as minus-60° as they search for fossilized evidence of a once lush and verdant Antarctica that might enlighten us as to the history of our planet.
